People have always like shopping. Doesn't matter ~~was~~ if it was online or in-store. My project, which I am still working on, is aimed at finding out what shopping preferences people have in online and in-store shopping.

I can identify two main features of the statistics presented in the table. The first one is that the majority of people were likely to buy grocery in-store than online. And the second key feature is that only 23 percent people prefer to buy books, movies, music, games in-store, while the others ~~so~~ ~~preference~~ like to buy them online.

It is also worth mentioning that the number of people buying computer and electronics online and in-store aren't really different. Same goes with the clothes and footwear, where percent of buying items online are only slightly lower than in-store.

In my opinion, the statistics in the table reveal an important problem. We can see that to be honest, I prefer to buy health and beauty in-store, because I can always check if it's broken or not. When I'm shopping online, obviously, I can't do the same, until it's gonna arrive to me. Also, I prefer avoid to buy computer and electronics online. Online shops tends to sell electronics that doesn't work and say that it was not their fault.

In conclusion, I believe that it is important to remember about in-store shopping and not always stick to online shopping, because sometimes it is better to buy thing in reality.
